"16th-century intrigue, muscled men with claymores and a doomed romance -- is it any wonder I was reluctant to leave the rich, riveting world of Highland Seer? From the Inside Flap

She swallowed and licked her lips. "Ye are the man I need, Donal."

He didn't flinch, but his eyes narrowed again.

"Do ye, now? Has yer Sight shown ye this?" Quick as a viper, he uncrossed his arms and grabbed hers, lifting her onto her toes. His lips waited a whisper away from her mouth, taunting her. "Are ye certain that's all ye need me for, Ellie? Is that why ye came to my chamber?"

Startled, she shoved against his chest. She had as much success as pushing against a fire-warmed granite wall. He didn't resist, didn't shake her, merely stood, as if waiting for her to decide what she would do. As if he held all his power leashed, under tight control. His breath on her lips fanned the flames in Ellie's face. Her heart thudded as his chest muscles flexed beneath her fingers.

"Nay. Aye." She pushed again with one fist, torn between making him release her and making him listen. "Nay!"

He let go of her suddenly. Ellie nearly fell as she lost the support of his grip. He steadied her, then released her again and moved toward the door.

"I'm sorry, lass. I shouldna done that." He spread his fingers, then clenched them into a fist. "Yer touch...ye make me forget my place."
